

The Meridian Method

Meridian Coaching works from a single framework across every engagement, called the Meridian Method. It was built on the observation that most coaching relationships stall not because the client lacks motivation, but because nobody separated what the client actually wants from what they believe they are supposed to want. The Meridian Method starts there, before any goal setting happens.

Four Pillars

Clarity comes first: naming the outcome the client actually wants, in their own words, separated from inherited expectations from a parent, a former manager, or a prior version of themselves. A coach cannot help a client reach a goal that was never really theirs.

Capacity is an honest accounting of the time, energy, and money the client actually has available, not the amount they wish they had. Plans built against wished-for capacity are the single most common reason coaching engagements fail to produce change.

Constraints means naming the real obstacle, which is usually not the one the client leads with. A client who says they lack discipline is often, on closer examination, dealing with an unclear priority, a schedule conflict, or a fear they have not stated out loud yet.

Cadence is the sustainable pace of action and accountability the client can actually keep up, week over week, without burning out by the six week mark. Meridian coaches are trained to slow a client down who is setting a cadence they cannot sustain, since a missed pace does more damage to momentum than a slower one ever would.

The Baseline Assessment

Every client completes the Meridian Baseline Assessment before their first full session. It scores five domains on a scale of one to ten: career, relationships, health, finances, and sense of purpose. The Baseline Assessment is re-administered at the midpoint of an engagement and again at the end, so progress is measured against a client's own starting point rather than compared to anyone else's.

How Sessions Work

Sessions run fifty minutes and take place over video by default, with phone available on request. Meridian does not offer in-person sessions at any location; the practice is fully remote. With a client's consent, a session recording is kept available to that client for thirty days afterward, so they can revisit anything discussed.

Who Delivers the Coaching

Meridian Coaching is a small practice of three coaches, each credentialed through the International Coaching Federation and trained directly in the Meridian Method before taking on clients. A new client is matched with one primary coach based on their Baseline Assessment results and the goals discussed on the discovery call, and works with that same coach for the length of the engagement.
